

New Plan For City Council Districts

by {ga=abeveridge,csalazar}

Friday, November 16, 2012 08:42 PM - Last Updated Wednesday, July 30, 2014 03:10 PM

NEW YORK — A new proposed map for New York City Council district lines addresses some concerns of civil rights groups and reflects changing demographics, while also safeguarding incumbents.

But the Districting Commission was criticized for voting to approve the new plan at a meeting Thursday night before it had even released the information to the public. The full City Council

New Plan For City Council Districts

by {ga=abeveridge,csalazar}

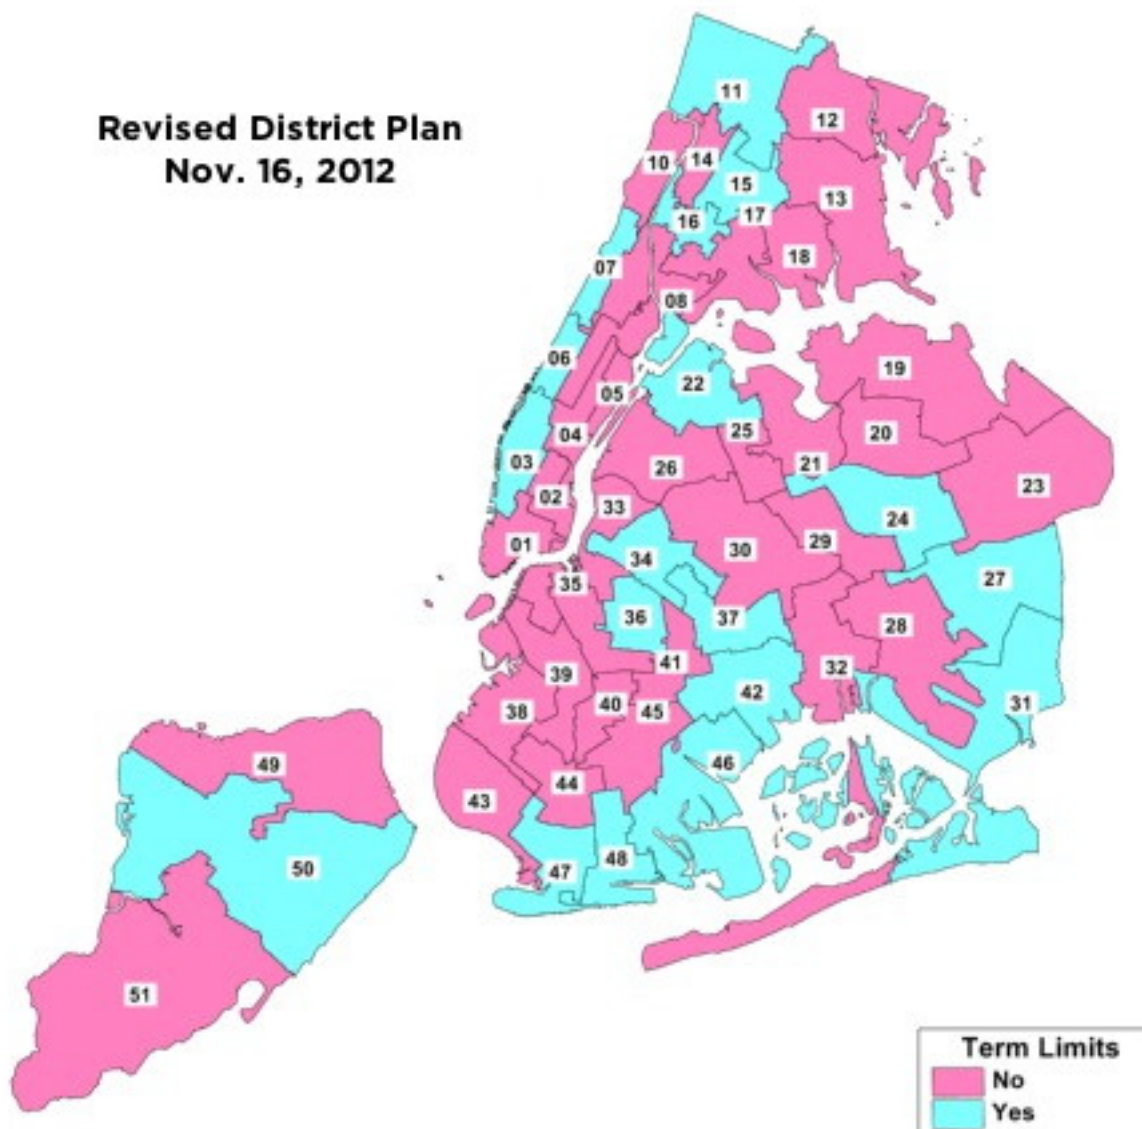

Friday, November 16, 2012 08:42 PM - Last Updated Wednesday, July 30, 2014 03:10 PM

must now

ap

prove the new map

Since the commission also supplied an analysis related to the Voting Rights Act by Lisa Hadley, a renowned expert in that field, it is clear that the revised plan had been crafted days ago and could have been released at the Commission's discretion.

The above map presents a view of the revised plan for new Council districts, along with whether

New Plan For City Council Districts

by {ga=abeveridge,csalazar}

Friday, November 16, 2012 08:42 PM - Last Updated Wednesday, July 30, 2014 03:10 PM

or not the current incumbent is term limited. Courtesy of Social Explorer.

It took until Friday afternoon for the revised district plan to be posted on the Commission's website for the public to view it.

Asked why the map was not released to the public before the Commission voted to approve it, the Commission's executive director, Carl Hum, said there was still time for the public to make its comments on the plan.

"If there is a desire by the public to have more hearings, they can certainly voice that to the Council," he said. The Council could also reject the lines, forcing the Commission to hold another hearing. "The process is far from over."

He said that the new map was drawn taking into account comments from the public, civil rights groups and legislators, as well as maps created by members of the public .

Responding to criticism that the lines had been drawn to protect incumbency, he said legislators' also had a stake in the process. "While not saying that's the primary consideration, or the overarching consideration â€¦ It is part of the toolkit," he said.

Read Andrew A. Beveridge's analysis of the preliminary maps and how they protect incumbents.

The current Council has 46 Democrats and five Republicans. In 2013, an additional 18 seats will be open due to the impact of the change in the city's charter regarding term limits. How those districts are drawn will have a lot to do with recruiting new political leadership in New York City for the next decade.

Unlike the state, the city has a non-legislative redistricting commission, which has held hearings and a series of maps.

New Plan For City Council Districts

by {ga=abeveridge,csalazar}

Friday, November 16, 2012 08:42 PM - Last Updated Wednesday, July 30, 2014 03:10 PM

The commission consists of 15 members — seven appointed by the mayor, five by the Council Democrats and three by the Council Republicans. One third of the commissioners are from Manhattan, which has about one-fifth of the population, two from the Bronx and Brooklyn each, and three from Staten Island and Queens each.

This structure is seen by some political observers as an advance over the redistricting process at the state level, where legislators themselves were able to draw the lines for the Assembly and Senate lines after Gov. Andrew Cuomo waffled on his promise to veto any maps that were clearly gerrymandered.

Nevertheless, the proposed maps have been criticized for dividing neighborhoods and ignoring communities of shared interest.

>>> View a table about the new districts under the revised plan, including the incumbent, the year elected, term limit status, voting age, citizenship, race and Hispanic status.

The Unity coalition of minority advocates — including LatinoJustice PRLDEF, Asian American Legal Defense And Education Fund, and Center for Law and Social Justice at Medgar Evers College — presented a common plan that attempted to keep neighborhoods intact and attempted to maximize the influence of African Americans, Latinos and Asian Americans on the new Council.

In a statement released after Thursday night's vote by the Commission, AALDEF noted that under the new proposed map that several Asian American communities remained divided but that some of the Unity Map's suggestions were taken into account.

Jerry Vattamala, a staff attorney with ALDEF, said in a statement that the Commission's proposed map "has room for improvement in enabling New York City's federally protected communities of color to have an equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice."

New Plan For City Council Districts

by {ga=abeveridge,csalazar}

Friday, November 16, 2012 08:42 PM - Last Updated Wednesday, July 30, 2014 03:10 PM

Image of New York City, seen from space, courtesy of NASA.