

The Many Faces of Poverty

by Gotham Gazette Staff
Monday, September 25, 2006 12:00 AM

Tenement House

Mayor Michael Bloomberg's poverty commission (officially called the Commission for Economic Opportunity) released its long awaited report on September 18, with a slew of statistics and recommendations about confronting poverty. Below, a dozen responses, which offer a glimpse at some of the many kinds of New Yorkers who are poor:

Disconnected Youth

The Many Faces of Poverty

by Gotham Gazette Staff
Monday, September 25, 2006 12:00 AM

David Zaslav's Fight for the City's Poor is a Good Start (Read More)
A Blueprint for Children

With 50 percent of all children in New York being born into poverty, the mayor's plan provides a good blueprint for addressing the problem, writes Donna Lawrence of the Children's Defense Fund. The key, though, is how he fills in the details on health insurance, childcare and other important issues. (Read More)

The Working Poor

Urban anthropologist Katherine Newman discusses how many fast food workers "one of the archetypical jobs for the working poor" were able to work their way from poverty to the middle class "and why those who couldn't do so failed. (Read More)

The Government's Role

Heather MacDonald of Manhattan Institute's City Journal urges the government to concentrate on the few things it can do -- creating rigorous, demanding schools and safe streets --, and stay away from things beyond its capacity, such as forcing people to be responsible parents. (Read More)

New Yorkers on Welfare

The Many Faces of Poverty

by Gotham Gazette Staff
Monday, September 25, 2006 12:00 AM

Explicitly, dealing with getting New Yorkers from welfare to better jobs, Poverty must Help People Get Good Jobs Read More

As more jobs pay less and offer fewer benefits, the number of poor people increases. Bich Ha Pham of Hunger Action Network says any strategy to reduce poverty must help people get better jobs. (Read More)

Keeping People Out of College

Higher education can help people get out of poverty but, writes Lynne Weikart of Baruch College, a number of barriers, from high tuition to welfare rules, keep New Yorkers out of college. (Read More)

Poverty Among the Elderly

Seniors in New York City are more than twice as likely to live in poverty as the elderly across the country, writes Bobbie Sackman of the Council of Senior Centers and Services of New York City. She explains why and proposes some steps that could be taken to address the problem. (Read More)

From Foster Care To Poverty

"Aging out" of foster care often leads to a life of poverty. For that to change, argue Betsy Krebs and Paul Pitcoff of Youth Advocacy Center, the foster care system must change. (Read More)

Immigrants and the Language Barrier

The Many Faces of Poverty

by Gotham Gazette Staff
Monday, September 25, 2006 12:00 AM

Available on the City Search Wires Change What's new Site New York Home Integration Contact Feedback Help

The High Cost of Credit

High-interest loans and a shortage of decent financial services in low-income neighborhoods make New York's poor even poorer, says Sarah Ludwig of the Neighborhood Economic Development Advocacy Project. (Read More)

Implementing the Plan

Public Advocate Betsy Gotbaum praises the mayor for confronting poverty, but says the issue of funding must be addressed, and public benefits and programs for single mothers should be added as the commission's strategy is implemented. (Read More)

Â